

Medicaid Reimbursements By State For 2021

In 2021, State Medicaid programs collectively reimbursed over 1.46 billion prescriptions across the United States. But which states received the bulk of this support, and where might more help be needed?

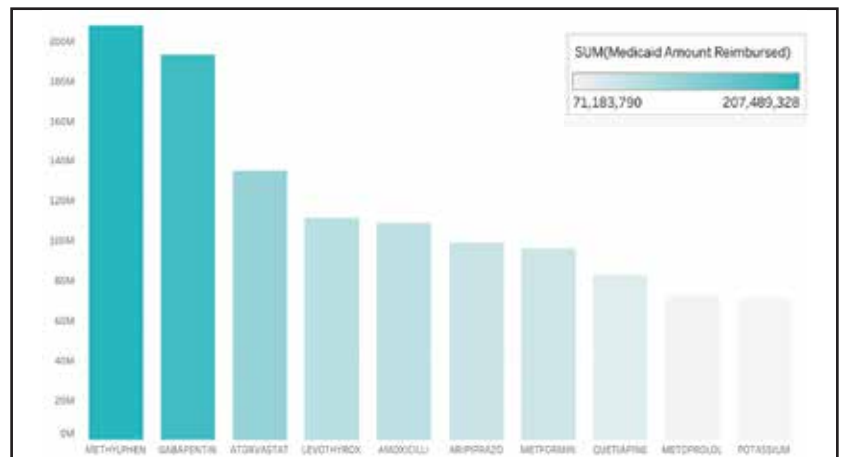

An analysis reveals that California and New York led the nation in the number of medications reimbursed. In contrast, Wyoming and South Dakota had the lowest reimbursement totals, suggesting potential disparities in access or demand.

The data also highlighted which medications are most in demand. Methylphenidate (commonly used for ADHD) and Gabapentin (used for nerve pain and seizures) were the two most frequently reimbursed prescriptions nationwide.

While Alaska and Hawaii are not displayed on the accompanying map, their data was included in the overall analysis. These findings point to significant differences in Medicaid medication reimbursements across states and suggest areas where increased support and further research may be needed.

Number of Medicaid-Covered Prescriptions By State

Total Cost Reimbursed Per Top 10 Medications

Possible Further Research:

How does population play a role in this data?

Which states could use more support?

Is there more popular medications that patients would be benefited by being covered?